FOREWORD

This Record of the Alumni of the Kansas State Agricultural College, issued at the end of the first half century of its work, is most convincing evidence of the usefulness of the institution. The most notable contribution the past half century has made to educational ideals is that of education for service. Kansas was one of the first states of the union to accept the conditions of the Morrill act, and she has done her part in making the new education.

The record here presented is a brief outline of hundreds of lives that have been influenced by the College. It is a record of which the institution and the State may well be proud. In it are the stories in brief of the success of men and women who have worked to make life better and brighter. These brief notes merely suggest the work done. Many of these one-line records of "Housewife" enfold stories of a noble womanhood that has blessed a family and been an inspiration to a community. The simple record "Farmer" expands into a successful life of endeavor for better agriculture and a higher type of rural civilization.

The pages tell of the success of co-education, of romance, of homes in which K. S. A. C. traditions have been a part of life; and from these homes have come sons and daughters who share the honor of being alumni. The lists of the later years bear many names familiar to students of the earlier days: Haines, Failyer, Griffing, Berry, Reed, Hopper, Knostman, Lightfoot, Willard, Calvin, Coons, Sikes, Elliott, Breese, Gale, Sanders.

Unfortunately, there are presented only the records of those who "have finished the course." The College also has influenced for good thousands of men and women whose names are in the lists of former students, but who did not graduate.

The alumni and students have been a force in the growth of the College, State, and Nation—a force that will grow greater as each member recognizes the possibilities of the services that he may render. A closer organization, with more local associations of alumni and former students, can give the State a more definite idea of the College needs, and can help it to accomplish the purpose for which it was created.

H. J. WATERS

To the Alumni:

The Alumni Association of the Kansas State Agricultural College, at its annual meeting, June 18, 1912, instructed its Board of Directors to assess each member one dollar, collect the necessary data, and publish a register of the graduates.

The occasion of the semi-centennial being at hand, the Board believed that information concerning the alumni would be appreciated, and began the collection of funds and data.

The task has required more time than the Board at first supposed would be necessary. The graduates of the College are scattered widely, and considerable effort has been required to secure even an incomplete directory. Several communications have been addressed to members who did not respond to the first or second inquiry, and every effort made to secure information. When no information has been secured, the last known address and occupation is given and the name is starred in the record. Members are urged to keep the association informed concerning changes of address or occupation, that the College may have a correct directory and the labor of issuing later reports be minimized.

COLLEGE HISTORY

The entire history of a college can never be written. What an institution is depends upon the ideals and activities of so many individuals that none can trace results to their origin. At first a thought in the mind of one, it is no sooner shared with another than it begins to undergo modification, and as still others become involved, it is further developed and elaborated.

No college president may claim all of the credit or be charged with all of the blame for his administration. Without his faculty he can do but little that is constructive, and the latter cannot evade a certain degree of responsibility for his errors. The members of the governing board have a part, and often a dominant one, in shaping the destiny of an institution.

But the makers of college history are not limited to its officers; the student body itself has a considerable influence. You may take a boy in college, but you cannot make him think as you do, always; and the settled thought of a body of students will have its effect on the management. Moreover, many of the students, especially those who are graduated, continue to make college history for many years, or throughout a lifetime. One interested in Alma Mater can help her in hundreds of little ways and sometimes in a few large ones.

The citizens of the state and the nation have in the aggregate a large, in fact at times a determining effect upon a college. And so we see that the history of a college cannot be completely written, any more than we can trace all of the material atoms of a tree to the rocks, winds, and waters that have held them. As a flower crowns with beauty and perfume the unnumbered details of chemical and physical processes, so our colleges are blossoms growing from the social order which characterizes modern civilization, and who shall say to any: "Thou hadst no part in their production?"

The student body knows little of college history in the making; even many of the faculty do not know what is going on, or appreciate the significance of that of which they know. Those in closest touch know only in part. Hence any one who writes college history becomes at once the target for shafts of criticism and correction from those who have seen other things or seen through other glasses. At several periods in the history of our College, feeling has been scourged to such keenness of sensibility that judicial consideration of the situation was impossible, and to write of it now is almost to invite rejoinder and controversy. The general excellence of the administration of the College is shown by the fact that, with the exception of short intervals, whenever the radical changes have taken place, the student body has for the most part been loyal to the then existing order.

The Kansas State Agricultural College was really founded in the hearts of early settlers of Manhattan who, February 9, 1858, obtained a charter for Bluemont Central College. This was established under the auspices of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and, while of the standard classical type, provided for an agricultural department, and experiments upon soils, trees, crops, etc. To the presence of this compact body of forceful men, enthusiastic and self-sacrificing in the cause of education, is probably due the location of the Agricultural College at Manhattan. February 16, 1863, the State accepted the offer of the church to donate Bluemont College, its real estate, library, etc., to the State, for the purpose of transforming it into an agricultural college such as was provided for by the land-grant act of July 2, 1862, the conditions of which were accepted by the State of Kansas, February 3, 1863.

The College opened as the State Agricultural College September 2, 1863. The current year therefore completes the first half-century of its history, and it is fitting that this register of its alumni appear, and that it contain something in the nature of an historical summary. The latter must necessarily be brief and inadequate for lack of space, and for reasons already set forth. It has been the privilege of the author to see much of this history in the making, and it will be his effort to treat matters in the spirit of kindness and justice. Some things must be left out, of necessity, and among these will be those that rankle and fan the embers of contention. The College officers and the students have always been intensely loyal to the institution and to its interests as related to the State. Personal differences of judgment must always exist, and personal feelings toward individuals cannot but have some influence upon the judgment. We are all but human, and personal ambition, selfishness, and other human traits that do not always work to the best interests of our fellows may be conceded to have had some small part all through the half-century, and probably to have had a greater part at some points than at others. To attempt to fix these points would lead only to fruitless discussion. There is much sound philosophy as well as charity in the thought that "If we knew all, we would forgive all," and the only thing for alumni to do is to rejoice in the manifest unquestionable continuity of progress in the College, and, forgetting those things which are behind, to press on toward a higher mark for our Alma Mater.

THROUGH FIVE ADMINISTRATIONS

The College has had six presidents, viz: Joseph Denison, 1863-1873; John A. Anderson, 1873-1878; George T. Fairchild, 1879-1897; Thomas E. Will, 1897-1899; Ernest R. Nichols, 1899-1909; and Henry J. Waters, 1909 to the present. Prof. Milan L. Ward was acting president from the spring of 1878 to November, 1879, and President Nichols served his first year, 1899-1900, in the same capacity.

The Denison Administration

The Agricultural College being at first but Bluemont Central College rechristened and nation-endowed, retaining its old Faculty in part, continued with its old ideals to a large extent. It is important to recognize, however, that the charter of Bluemont College provided for "an agricultural department, with separate professors, to test soils, experiment in the raising of crops, the cultivation of trees, etc., upon a farm set apart for the purpose, so as to bring out to the utmost practical results, the agricultural advantages of Kansas, especially the capabilities of the high prairie lands."

The first annual report to the superintendent of public instruction emphasized the importance of making a beginning at once in the agricultural department. The legislature was asked to make appropriations for this, but did not. The federal land endowment of the College was looked upon as relieving the State from any appropriations. As the land had not been sold, there was no income from it at first, and the College became involved in debt. The legislature made appropriations to lend the College money for running expenses, the same to be repaid later from the interest income. In 1870, the amounts that had been advanced were appropriated to the College for the purpose of developing the agricultural department. However, as the College did not have the money, the appropriation did little but extinguish the debt. In April, 1871, Manhattan township voted $12,000 to buy land for farming. With this, and some money from the interest fund, the present College campus was purchased, and also 160 acres on Wild Cat creek. The latter seems not to have been retained, perhaps was never wholly paid for.

In 1867, 500 forest trees and 200 apple trees were planted, also small numbers of other fruit trees. Additional plantings were made in 1869 and 1871, and in 1872 an experimental forest was set. At the end of the year, 36,570 trees were growing in the forest, and the shelter belts. The vineyard at the same time contained 1280 vines, mostly Concord. Numerous fruit trees of the common species, and in very many varieties, were on trial. Peaches and grapes were sold in 1872 to the value of $194.66.

The lands on the College farms were at first cultivated in the ordinary way, but gradually more and more systematically, trials were made of fertilizers, special crops, methods of soil preparation, methods of planting, etc. The annual report for 1872 includes about twenty pages devoted to reporting the results of agricultural operations. Although efforts were made continually, it was with much difficulty that the legislature was induced to make any appropriation even for agriculture. By the terms of the federal law all buildings must be furnished by the State, but up to 1872 nothing had been done. Bluemont College was the only building. The legislature of 1872 made an appropriation with which the stone wall enclosing the present campus was built and a barn was begun. Only one wing of this was ever completed. It was used as a barn until 1875, when it was taken for College classes. It has served many purposes since: General class-rooms; chapel; society hall; dormitories; residence of the professor of agriculture; quarters for departments of zoology, botany, bacteriology, and veterinary science; armory, etc. It is now used for instruction in farm mechanics, and for housing the machinery used in that work.

Altogether the administration of President Denison conducted an arduous work. Space does not permit going further into details. Those were pioneer times and the State could scarcely afford to appropriate much money for the College. The unremitting efforts of boards of regents had, however, begun to yield some results, and State support of the College may be said to have really begun in 1872. Education in agriculture was but an experiment at best, and to the writer it seems that the Faculty of those days should be commended for what it did, rather than criticised for what it did not do. The College did important work in giving to young people an education that helped them in all of the duties of life, and at a minimum of expense. Many of these went out to teach in the common schools of the State and thus spread the benefits of the College.

The Anderson Administration

With the administration of President Anderson all instruction in Latin and Greek was soon abolished, and it has never been restored to the curriculum. Practical and theoretical study of agriculture was greatly extended, and daily work at some industry was required of every student. These "industrials" were a distinctive feature of the institution for twenty years or more, but they have been to a large extent gradually replaced by systematic laboratory exercises carried out for the most part in connection with theoretical instruction.

John A. Anderson

During the Anderson administration instruction in farm and nursery work and music was continued and extended, and industrials were established in sewing, cooking, printing, telegraphy, stenography, and photography. The shop work was much amplified, the previous facilities having been very meager. Science teaching was improved by specializing slightly. Chemistry was notably strengthened by the energy and ability of Professor Kedzie, through whose efforts a building for instruction in that science was erected. Three other buildings were erected, for horticulture, agriculture, and mechanic arts, respectively. The building for agriculture is now the north wing of Anderson Hall.

Agricultural facilities, equipment, and experimentation were advanced greatly, being under the administration of one of the ablest and most forceful men ever connected with the College, Prof. Edward M. Shelton, a graduate of the Michigan Agricultural College.

President Anderson also founded the college paper, "The Industrialist," which persists to this day, though it has passed through several forms. He used it as laboratory material for the students in printing, and as a means of giving publicity to the College with its new ideas in education. It has been a valuable adjunct in the development of the College, but has entailed much work upon its editor.

The catalogue for 1874 was called a "Handbook of the Kansas State Agricultural College," and 61 of its 124 pages were occupied by President Anderson in setting forth his ideas upon liberal and practical education. There can be little doubt, looking at matters in the perspective of forty years, that he was extreme; that he was ultra-practical, and failed to see the real value of much of what is too lightly stigmatized as theoretical. Nevertheless, the time required his iconoclastic work to tear the College completely loose from the bonds of traditional education, and to place it squarely in a new setting where it has since remained.

President Anderson and his Faculty were by no means a unit in view, and his abandonment of the College, and entry into the field of politics in which he was distinguished by the same bold practicality, was probably to a certain extent due to his inability to carry the Faculty completely with him. The work that he did roused great opposition from friends of the old educational methods, and the friends of the Faculty of the previous administration, but it is generally recognized to-day that it was work that needed doing, and that if he went too far, his excess was easily corrected.

The Fairchild Administration

President Fairchild, before coming to the College, had been professor of English literature in the Michigan Agricultural

George T. Fairchild

College. That institution was rated as the best of its kind in the country at that time. Prof. E. M. Shelton, then professor of agriculture here, was one of its alumni, and it is said that his influence had much to do with the election of Professor Fairchild to the presidency. Professor Fairchild had for fifteen years been active as a member of the faculty of the Michigan college, and his brother-in-law, Dr. R. C. Kedzie, professor of chemistry there, was one of the most forceful of the men in early agricultural education.

President Fairchild was about forty years of age when he entered upon his duties here, and at this prime point of life he brought to his task a well-matured judgment based on an adequate experience in a kindred college. Still more, he brought ideals of private and public life and service, a sense of order and of justice, and a big heart full of sympathy for all right ambitions of youth. The College was still small, scarcely more than two hundred students being in attendance at any one time. President Fairchild knew them all personally, and with his own hand wrote the assignment of each to the work of each term. After examinations, each delinquent received his personal touch, whether of needed stimulus, unsparring presentation of unpleasant truth, or gentle sympathy.

He inaugurated a system of weekly Faculty meetings, in which all matters touching the students and the internal affairs of the College were discussed and acted upon by the entire Faculty. As numbers increased, this method became less well-adapted to conditions, but the training that it gave to the Faculty developed a spirit of loyalty and substantial unity that comes only from complete discussion of the diverse and numerous questions that constantly arise in college life. He encouraged the freest expression of views, and though his own were usually adopted in the end, it was because of the compulsion of reason rather than that of authority. This discussion of all College matters by the entire Faculty was the means by which new members were assimilated and unity of aim accomplished. A president could scarcely have a more united and personally loyal faculty than that which President Fairchild created. To have sat in that Faculty for any length of time was to have received an education in frankness, fairness, courtesy, toleration, unselfishness, sympathy, and loftiness of all ideals.

The needs of the College for buildings during the administration of President Fairchild were met by the completion of the main College building, since named Anderson Hall; the enlargement of the chapel, which is part of it; the erection of a power plant and a machine shop; the enlargement of the College barn; the erection of a barn for the Horticultural Department; the erection of a residence for the president; and the erection of a building for the library and certain departments, and now known as Fairchild Hall. The appropriation for a building for domestic science and art was obtained in 1897, but it was constructed by the next administration. This is now used for the Departments of English, Journalism, and Printing, and has been named Kedzie Hall.

The most prominent feature of the references to finances in the earlier reports of the College is the idea that with the exception of providing buildings the State would be at no expense in supporting the College as soon as the land endowment was sold. A constant shortage of funds thus existed. The Farm Department from early years made experiments in crop production, soil treatment, etc. In 1887, Congress passed the Hatch act, by which agricultural experiment stations were financed for each state. The first appropriation under this act was for fifteen thousand dollars for the year ending June 30, 1888. This appropriation has been repeated for each year since. This addition to the income enabled the College to enter upon much more extensive work in experimentation, and to increase salaries of members of the Faculty. In 1890, the budget of the College was still further augmented by means of another act of Congress, due to Senator Morrill. Through this act fifteen thousand dollars was appropriated for 1890, and amounts increasing by one thousand dollars each year until the appropriation under this law reached twenty-five thousand dollars a year. This fund is "applied only to instruction in agriculture, the mechanic arts, the English language, and the various branches of mathematics, physical, natural and economic science, with special reference to the industries of life, and to the facilities for such instruction."

The income from the endowment fund was diminishing because of the fall in interest rates, but the Hatch act and the Morrill act of 1890, together, nearly trebled the College income. Notwithstanding this, the growth of the College was such that by the middle of the decade beginning with 1890 the need of additional resources was felt severely. There was delay in payment of bills, and salaries the latter part of the fiscal year could not be paid until the next year's funds were available.

In 1897, the legislature began making appropriations for maintenance by an allowance of ten thousand dollars for the year 1896-'97, which was intended to make up the existing deficiency, and five thousand dollars for each of the next two years.

The last few years of the administration of President Fairchild were affected by the prevailing economic conditions of the time, and the varying views concerning their causes and remedies. He had himself taught political economy in the College and it is generally conceded that this delicate work was conducted in an impartial manner. In 1894, the Board elected Thomas Elmer Will as professor of economics in order that greater attention might be given to questions touching political policies in the broad sense. A course of weekly lectures, attendance upon which was required of all students, was established, and most of these were given by Professor Will. The students for the most part regarded him as a hard student and forceful teacher, who presented all sides of controverted questions, and who exacted hard work from the members of his classes.

President Fairchild made no notable change in College policies after 1890, although minor alterations in the course of study and the entrance requirements were adopted. It was a period of anxiety when conservatism seemed wiser than to open the doors to changes that might not be progress. Whether or not this was really wiser cannot be said, and one's judgment will depend upon his point of view.

In 1897, the legislature passed a law reorganizing the Board of Regents of the College and providing for new appointments to it. The president of the College was taken off the Board, an ex-officio member of which he had always been previously. When the new Board organized, it held that the new law terminated, on the first of the next July, the period of employment of every employee of the College, from the president down. President Fairchild declined to be a candidate for re-election and Professor Will was elected president.

The Will Administration

The administration of President Will began July 1, 1897. Nine members of the old Faculty were not re-elected, and two who were re-elected declined to stay, leaving twelve of the old members in service, with eleven new ones. The new Faculty revised the course of study to a certain extent in July, increasing the opportunity for specialization in agriculture and in engineering.

During the fall term, after the new Faculty had gotten fairly to work, a thorough reconsideration of the curriculum was made and three courses of study were formulated, which were designated as agricultural, engineering, and general. Each of these courses required a greatly increased amount of work in history, economics, and political science. The general character of each was indicated by the name. In the spring, a four-year course in household economics was prepared, and the catalogue for 1897-'98 shows these four courses, which, with modifications and further specializations, have continued to the present.

The beginning of systematic instruction by means of short courses, for which very low entrance requirements are demanded, was made in the offering of a course in dairying for the winter term, 1898. This was received with much favor and served as a starting point for the campaign which brought an appropriation for a "dairy building" that gave ample quarters for the agricultural department at that time. This building was not actually erected until 1900, but the appropriation for it was obtained by this administration, as was also an appropriation for a dairy barn.

The administration of the local affairs of the College by President Will was marked by a movement toward action by committees rather than by the Faculty as a whole. The Faculty meetings were cut to once in two weeks, and soon drifted to a less frequent occurrence. A committee was appointed to take over the work of assignment of students to classes. This had become too burdensome for the president to attend to personally, and was still further increased by the changes in the course of study. The assignments as made out by the committee members were sent to the president for approval. This was a distinct advance which the growth of the College demanded.

Previous to this time, at each meeting of the Board of Regents a joint session of the Faculty and the Board had been held, at which each member of the Faculty had presented the needs of his department. Later the Board acted upon their requests, and made appropriations for the quarter for such purposes as it deemed best. Similarly, authorizations for the expenditure of Experiment Station funds were made quarterly upon the recommendations of the Experiment Station Council, which consisted of the department heads engaged in station work. During President Will's administration these practices were gradually modified and the present system adopted, whereby allotments of funds are made annually to the several departments. This enables plans to be made in a more comprehensive manner, equity among departments to be more carefully considered, and department heads to be held to account in respect to expenditures and results.

The administration of President Will was conducted under conditions of constant stress and controversy, most of which was among people outside the College, however. The activities of the College were enlarged, and notwithstanding the appropriations for current expense, the College was delinquent in payments to a considerable extent at the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899. By the political road the Board of Regents was transformed in the spring of 1899, and June 10 it voted that the services of President Will, Secretary Phipps, and Professors Bemis, Ward, and Parsons "be dispensed with after June 30, 1899." Prof. Ernest R. Nichols was elected acting president.

The Nichols Administration

Professor Nichols, like Professor Will, entered upon his new duties at a time when the State was hot with controversy, the merits of which can scarcely be peacefully discussed even at this day by those most intimately involved. Suffice to say that the futility of newspaper war was seen by the acting president, and that he definitely adopted the policy of excluding from "The Industrialist" all reference to the matters in contention. As issued by him, it will be searched in vain for criticism of his predecessors, and he paid no public attention to attacks in other papers. This policy soon brought about, practically, a cessation of hostilities and a condition in which the acts of the administration were judged on their merits, rather than as seen through prejudice. The acting president became president July 1, 1900.

When the new Board of Regents took charge in May, 1899, it took legal advice concerning the existing delinquency in payment of College bills. Acting upon this advice, it decided to pay no bills for expenditures incurred previous to July 1, 1899, for which funds were not at that time available; to start with a clean account book, and to conduct the business of the institution on the principle of not spending money till you have it. As a result, thousands of dollars of indebtedness, including much in salaries of teachers, were not paid until the legislature made an appropriation for that purpose. Throughout the ten years of the administration of President Nichols there was never a moment when there was not in the College treasury a balance remaining from the funds at his disposal. He insisted upon it, even to the point of creating trouble with some members of the Faculty, that departments must keep within their allowances. The Board voted that any department-head exceeding his appropriation should forfeit his position. The result was that the credit of the College became gilt-edged, and a condition was created under which the legislature from session to session could be approached on a business basis and asked for appropriations without the necessity of defense against a charge of business mismanagement of funds already allowed.

President Nichols was a man of few words, either written or spoken, but he, with assistance from others of course, succeeded in establishing the College in the confidence of the people to such an extent as to enable him to get appropriations for buildings and maintenance far beyond that of anything previously thought of. The following buildings were provided for: Physical Science Hall, Dairy Hall, Auditorium, Horticulture Hall, Veterinary Hall, Domestic Science and Art Hall, Mechanical Engineering Hall, Seed House, Gymnasium and Armory, and extensive glass houses for the Departments of Horticulture, Botany, Agronomy, and Entomology. In addition, Fairchild Hall was greatly enlarged, the shops were enlarged to more than double their former capacity, and the old chemical laboratory, which was burned May 31, 1900, was rebuilt as a Women's Gymnasium.

The four courses of study established by the preceding administration were revised considerably in 1899 and continued. The main features of the revision were that the first year was made the same for all students, excepting for such differences as sex required, and that the required work in history and political science was reduced. The first year was made of a generalized character, designed to give some knowledge concerning sciences, agriculture, shop work, and domestic science. Short courses were established in agriculture and in home economics, and the dairy course was continued.

From time to time the courses were revised and additional ones were formulated as follows: Electrical engineering, 1900; architecture, 1905; veterinary, 1906; and printing, 1908. In 1908, the agricultural course beyond the sophomore year was split into five courses, namely: Agronomy, animal husbandry, dairy husbandry, poultry husbandry, and horticulture and forestry. Although these were thus set out as separate courses, they had much in common, each one differing from the others by certain characteristic studies as indicated by the name. There thus existed at the close of the Nichols administration thirteen four-year courses.

In addition to great growth in the material equipment of departments, which accompanied extension and diversification of the instruction given at the College, the work of the institution was greatly enlarged in respect to activities in the State at large. The work of the farmers' institutes was very greatly increased and a special superintendent appointed to take charge of it. In this connection special trains were run for the purpose of carrying lecturers with illustrative material directly to the people, and two series of pamphlets, one for rural teachers and one for members of farmers' institutes, were established.

The work of the Agricultural Experiment Station was very greatly enlarged, partly through the assistance given by the Adams act, by which Congress appropriated $5000 in 1906, an amount which was increased $2000 a year until it reached $15,000, at which it still continues. A branch station, which has become a very large factor in western Kansas agriculture, was established in 1901 on a part of the old Fort Hays Military Reservation, which was ceded to the State for that purpose. The College has there about 3500 acres, including some of the finest land in the region. A branch station was also started at Garden City. Through the influence of College authorities, laws regulating the sale of commercial fertilizers and concentrated feeding-stuffs in this State were enacted. These laws are administered by the director of the Agricultural Experiment Station. By the terms of the State food and drugs law, the director of the chemical laboratory was put in charge of a large portion of the food analyses for the State Board of Health. Another law established the office of dairy commissioner, appointment to which is made by the Board of Administration of the College.

The financial support of the College by the State, in addition to the erection of buildings, gradually became more and more generous, and in addition a third act of Congress, approved March 4, 1907, provided for increased support of the land-grant colleges from federal funds. This was known as the Nelson Amendment, by which $5000 was appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, and an annual increase of $5000 for each of the four succeeding years provided for, thus allowing $25,000 annually thereafter, in addition to amounts fixed by previous enactments.

The local management of the College under the Nichols administration underwent gradual modifications. The Faculty meetings once in two weeks, owing to business absences of the president, became less frequent, and finally were, practically, held on call. The committees on admission, assignments, and farmers' institutes controlled matters coming within their scope, respectively. The president continued to approve the assignments of students, but with slight exceptions this was little more than a formality.

The administrative duties of the College became so burdensome that in 1908 the Board of Regents established a Council of Deans to share these with the president, the deans performing such duties as he might direct. President Nichols made little use of the deans as such, however, and the council was not really organized, and the duties of its members, and of the council as a whole, stated until June, 1909. The office of director of the Experiment Station was revived to handle the executive duties belonging to that activity, which under the preceding administrations had been performed by the president as chairman of the Experiment Station Council. The director was given no responsibility for the work of departments, or authority to initiate or supervise work. The Station Council, consisting of the heads of departments in station work, considered the investigations to be undertaken, and recommended to the Board of Regents. In 1906, however, the status was changed and a director appointed who had no other duties, and who was given large responsibility for the conduct of departmental work in agricultural investigation. The Station Council was not abrogated, but soon became functionless.

In 1909, with the co-operation of the president, and the approval of the Faculty and the Board of Regents, a Students' Council was organized, which has served a very useful purpose even though its career has not been spectacular. Its members are chosen by class organizations, four from the senior class, three from the junior class, two from the sophomore class, and one from the freshman class. Its objects are: "(1) To act as a representative body before the governing officers of the College in all matters that concern the individual students, student organizations, or the student body as a whole; (2) to act as a body of mediation between different student organizations or enterprises whenever such service is sought by such organizations or enterprises; (3) to take cognizance of all matters that pertain to the good name and scholarship of the student body, to the end that high standards of honor on the campus and elsewhere may be maintained."

On the whole, the Nichols administration was marked by great expansion in material equipment, an increase in student attendance from 870 to 2308, a greater specialization in the courses of study offered, a marked extension in their scope, and notable increase in the extra-mural activities of the college.

The Waters Administration

The foregoing states in little more than bare outline the salient points of the five administrations preceding the one now in power. That it represents a continuous progress, a fairly consistent adherence to the fundamental purpose of higher education for the "industrial classes," and a wise development of new activities, and new methods of administration, can scarcely be seriously controverted. The day of small things has gone never to return, and methods ideal for a small institution are wholly impracticable now.

Henry Jackson Waters, dean of the College of Agriculture, University of Missouri, assumed the responsibilities of the presidency of the Kansas State Agricultural College, July 1, 1909. His administration is still in progress, and it is scarcely in place to attempt much in the way of its characterization at this time. President Waters took the organization of the College as he found it and deliberately adopted a policy of conservation until he should have become acquainted with the situation. A man of strong convictions and forceful personality, he recognizes the value of a sense of stability, and has been willing to hold his judgment in abeyance or defer action in minor matters for the sake of the greater good. He has greatly magnified the duties of the deans, relinquishing to them all supervision of the academic work of the students, and placing much responsibility upon them in respect to the personnel of the departments, and allowances of funds to them. He also confers freely with them on matters of College policy. The General Faculty meets at the beginning of each year, and on call of the president. Divisional Faculties, presided over by the deans, discuss matters relating to the respective divisions. These divisions are: Agriculture, Mechanic Arts, Home Economics, and General Science.

The courses of study were revised thoroughly in the winter of 1910, and the entrance requirements raised from six units to eight units of high school work. In the new courses the differentiation began with the freshman year. College education in agriculture is now so well established that there is no hesitation on the part of freshmen in electing such courses. The president from the first had looked forward to the time when fifteen units, four years of high school, should be required for entrance upon the College courses, and was disappointed in that the standard was not pushed up further at that time. With the hearty support of the Faculty he kept up pressure on the point, until in the fall of 1912, the Board of Regents raised the requirements to fifteen units. During the winter of 1913, new courses based on this requirement were formulated. The new requirements and courses were approved by the new governing power, the Board of Administration, and the College entered upon an era in which its students and graduates will be on the basis used by all high-grade colleges. This result must be credited almost entirely to the force, patience, and tact of the president.

Coincident with placing the College courses on a four-year high school basis has been the organization of a School of Agriculture, with three-year courses in agriculture, mechanic arts, and home economics, to which students are admitted from grammar and county schools, and the work in which is accepted toward college entrance. The patronage of this school, which opened September 16, 1913, has been most gratifying.

The work in College Extension has developed continuously and rapidly, until at the present time over twenty men and women are constantly employed in this work. This includes Farmers' Institutes, Demonstration Farming, Boys' and Girls' Meetings, Movable Schools of Agriculture, School Campaigns, Agricultural Trains, Exhibits at Fairs, assistance in Highway Engineering and in Drainage and Irrigation Engineering, Movable Schools in Home Economics, Girls' Home Economics Clubs, a Department of Study by Correspondence, and the publication of a series of pamphlets under the name of "Agricultural Education."

It will be seen from the foregoing that the present administration is one that is advancing the College in all legitimate lines. In addition to what has been stated, I think it may be fairly asserted that the most characterizing feature of the administration is that every opportunity is taken and many occasions made for putting the College in connection with the large problems and large enterprises that affect the permanent welfare of the rural communities. This includes such subjects as co-operative buying and selling, rural credits, the tenant system, problems of the rural church and rural life in general, conservation of agricultural resources and more effective utilization of them, etc. The friends of President Waters may rest assured that no matter when his administration ends, the record which the College makes under his guidance will have been one of marked progress.

COURSES OF STUDY

In 1863, the only course of study offered was in the classical department. It extended over five years, the first being preparatory. In addition to latin, greek, and mathematics, it included among other subjects: Botany, chemistry, philosophy, physiology, zoology, geology, mineralogy, meteorology, astronomy, agricultural chemistry, and Liebig's husbandry.

In 1864, a similar classical course appears in the catalogue, and also an agricultural course of three years, including a preparatory year that was the same as that for the classical course. The later agricultural subjects were: Orchard and fruit garden, fruit culture, treatise on the horse, book of the farm, diseases of domestic animals, agricultural chemistry, and analysis of the soil.

The third catalogue, 1866-'67, shows a military course, which was not, however, complete in itself, but presented an extensive list of military subjects which might be studied. The classical course was continued, and an agricultural and scientific course presented. This was far more detailed than its forerunners, and covered three years.

In the fourth catalogue, 1868-'69, the preparatory course is shown as extended to three years in length. The four-year courses based on this were designated as agricultural and scientific, college, and military. In both the third and the fourth catalogues other courses were named, but no formulation of them presented. These were: Mechanic arts and civil engineering, commercial and mercantile, and in the third catalogue a normal course.

The catalogue for 1870-'71 gives in detail two two-year preparatory courses, one agricultural, the other literary, and three four-year college courses, viz., agricultural, mechanic arts, military science, and literary.

The next catalogue issued, 1871-'72, shows a decided change in the statement of courses offered, and tabulates only a two-year course in the preparatory department and one four-year course in the collegiate department. For the first time a statement is made of the schedule of classes actually taught or to be taught, showing class periods and teachers. An interesting provision is included for "from seven to ten hours of practical instruction in agriculture under Superintendent Miller; in horticulture under Superintendent Gale; and in mechanics under Superintendent Todd." It is also stated that "students laboring in agricultural, horticultural, and mechanical departments are paid by the hour."

An undated four-page folder was issued, apparently in 1872 or 1873, which shows the two-year preparatory course and the four-year collegiate course. Complete courses in agriculture, mechanics, horticulture, and veterinary science were promised in the catalogue to be issued in December.

September 3, 1873, John A. Anderson accepted the presidency, and the next publication touching upon courses of study was the "Handbook" issued at the close of 1874. This is a notable document in that it sets forth in detail the president's ideas concerning education for the industrial classes. Perhaps his point of view may be briefly stated by the quotation of a paragraph beginning on page 65, as follows:

"The difference between our line and that of other agricultural colleges seems to be this: They take as an objective point the graduation of agricultural experts, who shall act as missionaries to working farmers. We take as an objective point the graduation of a capable farmer, able to make his living by farming. Their theory is that of the normal school, training teachers who shall instruct scholars; our theory is that of training the scholar. Along the mechanical branch, they seek to graduate master builders or superintendents of machine shops; we seek to graduate intelligent and skillful carpenters, masons, or blacksmiths. They strike directly for those industries considered the highest, and believe that in reaching them they include all below; we strike for the industries most commonly followed in this State, and by successfully mastering them expect to climb up to the very rarest. Their mode may be best for them, and we are not in the least criticizing it; ours seems best for us. Kansas is neither New York, Massachusetts, nor Ohio; and we shall not endeavor to reproduce their agricultural colleges. With us, where five agricultural scientists can make a living as such, five thousand capable farmers can far more than make a living; and where five architects or master mechanics can obtain employment, five times as many mechanics can command wages. We aim to provide a Kansas State Agricultural College for the practical education of those who desire to follow industrial vocations. In so doing, nothing of educational experience that is useful will be rejected because it is old; nor anything retained simply because it is practiced by literary colleges in educating for the professions. That which upon fair trial best serves our purpose will be employed; and that which does not will be discarded, though it were baldheaded with antiquity."

Three courses of study, designated as farmer's, mechanic's, and woman's, are formulated in the Handbook. Those were six years long, but the last two years of the mechanic's course were not worked out. The most characteristic features of the courses were the exclusion of the classic languages, and the requirement of an "Industrial" each term. "Household economy" appears in the curriculum for the first time.

The course of study during most of the Fairchild administration was given as one, but included some adaptations indicated by differences in the requirements of young men and young women. The entrance requirements, though raised somewhat from time to time, remained low, in harmony with the view that connection should be maintained with the country schools. Toward the end of the administration, a fifth year was added, for such as wished to take it, in which there was opportunity for considerable specialization. The industrial training inaugurated by President Anderson was extended, strengthened, and systematized. All young men were required to do a certain amount of farm and garden work, and all young women, certain domestic work. The general aim may be said to have been to develop young men and women in strength of character, ground them in the fundamental sciences, give some training in the branches that fit for citizenship and contribute to general culture, and to maintain or create a genuine regard for industrial pursuits. The technical training in any one line was not large, but the success with which the graduates of that period are doing the world's work is evidence of the soundness of the training that they received here.

Several of the agricultural colleges had introduced short winter courses for the benefit of farmers and of farmers' sons who could not comply with the entrance requirements or give the time necessary to complete a four-year course, and a beginning in this direction was made at this college by offering a two-weeks course. This was first given in 1894, beginning February 6. From 20 to 50 attended the sessions. A similar course was given in 1895 and 1896, but there was no material increase in attendance, and most of the auditors were from the vicinity of Manhattan. The course was therefore abandoned.

In the summer of 1897 the Faculty, under direction of President Will, made some modifications in the course of study then in use. These were in the senior year, which was differentiated into "farmers'," "mechanics'," and "women's" courses, in which increased opportunity for specific characteristic work was offered, and increased study of economics required. In the fall of the same year the subject of the curriculum was taken up in thorough-going fashion and three courses worked out which were designated as "agricultural," "engineering," and "general." These differed but little in the first-year work, the general course being nearly the same as the old course, the others introducing slight differences in the direction indicated by the name. In the upper years the differences were quite pronounced. In these courses we have the distinct entrance upon the policy, adhered to continuously since, of specialized college courses adapted to the differing needs of the students.

With the opening of the winter term, 1898, the students made choice from among these courses. All of the young women remained in the general course, which included, like the old course, some special variations to meet their needs, while a portion of the young men went to the new courses in agriculture or engineering.

As an unpublished bit of history it may be of interest to present the following table, which shows how the students elected courses at their first opportunity:

Classification of College Students, January, 1898

Year	Agricultural	Engineering	General	Total
First.....	10	50	119	179
Second.....	12	23	48	83
Third.....	14	9	21	44
Fourth.....	16	7	19	42
Total.....	52	89	207	348

These figures bring out strikingly the indisposition of boys fresh from the farm to choose an agricultural course at that time. Those who had been in the College for a year or more elected such a course more freely, thus showing that the College was educating toward the farm even under the old course. As the opportunities became better appreciated, the drift in the direction of the specialized courses constantly increased.

During the spring term, 1898, a four-year course in "household economics" was prepared and was offered to young women the next fall. This was received with favor from the first, and before many years most of the young women of the College elected it, or its successors, rather than the general science course.

In these courses the needs of students as the future rulers of the country were provided for by including in each course nine terms of history or political science. This was a large increase over the old course, and was made the occasion of much public discussion at the time, into the merits and demerits of which no entrance will be made at this time.

In May, 1899, a new Board of Regents took charge of the College and among other things provided for a revision of the courses of study. The president of the Board, E. T. Fairchild, appointed a committee from the Faculty to submit revisions of the courses to the Board. Professor Nichols was named as chairman of the committee. The committee held many sessions, and its members were unable to agree upon a report. Finally, two were submitted, and the minority report prepared by Professors Nichols, Hitchcock, and Willard was, perhaps with slight changes, adopted by the Board.

The names of the courses were changed to: Agriculture, mechanical engineering, science, and domestic science, the groups of students to which they appealed remaining practically as before. In these courses the required work in history and political science was cut from nine terms to five terms. The opportunity for electing subjects that one might choose was increased somewhat. One feature that remained in effect through all subsequent changes for eleven years was that of identity of the work for all first-year students, excepting for certain variations to adapt it to the differences in the needs of young men and young women. Also, that this freshman year provided for all students training in a biological science and a physical science; for all young men a term of agriculture and three terms of shop work; and for all young women a term of household economics. Military drill continued to be required of all young men, and, for the first time, physical training under the name of calisthenics was required of all young women in the first year. Physical training had been provided to a limited extent for some years to such young women as wished to take it, and the athletic club, made up from young men, had given such impetus as it could, under discouraging conditions, to physical training for men.

The technical and scientific work was increased in the new courses. The young science of bacteriology, which had already been included in the agricultural course, was now added to the science and the domestic science courses.

In addition to the four-year courses, a two-term short course in agriculture and mechanic arts was established, and a two-term course in domestic science. The one-term dairy short course was continued. All of these short courses, with more or less of amendments, have been continued to the present time.

In 1900, the course in electrical engineering was first presented. This was at that time identical with the mechanical engineering course, except for a few subjects in the fourth year. The course which had been called "general" for one year, and "science" for one year, was at the same time named "general science," under which designation it is still offered.

In 1903, the courses of study underwent another general revision by a committee of the Faculty. The course in electrical engineering was differentiated to a greater extent from the one in mechanical engineering, and there were many details of changes in all courses, but the general character remained the same.

In 1904, another revision took place in which the Faculty as a whole sat from day to day, and in which the president of the Board of Regents, Prof. E. T. Fairchild, also actively participated. This adhered to the general principles of its immediate predecessors, and readjusted the details with such success that the courses stood substantially unaltered until 1908, the longest period that this has been the case within the seventeen years since 1897. The German language was introduced as a required subject in the course in general science and the course in domestic science. German had been taught as an elective subject for some years, but with this change a Department of German was established.

Work in the mechanic arts line was further provided for in 1905 by offering a four-year course in architecture, which, like the course in electrical engineering, was uniform with that in mechanical engineering for the first two years, but differed markedly from it in the third and fourth years.

In 1906, the agricultural field of instruction was enlarged by providing a full four-year course in veterinary medicine. This is a strongly specialized course which has only a minimum connection with other courses through the fundamental work in English, the sciences, and political science, including history.

In 1908, by direction of the Board of Regents, a representative committee of the Faculty, appointed by the president, reconsidered the courses of study in every detail, the work extending over two or three months. Numerous changes in subjects were made, though the general principles remained the same. The most notable feature was the formulation of courses for an additional graduate year, in which were included subjects for which time could not be found in the four-year courses, and through which it was hoped that graduate study at the College would be brought to a more systematic basis. A four-year course in printing was included in the mechanic arts group, and a four-year course in poultry husbandry in the agriculture group. The total number of four-year courses was thus raised to thirteen, though of course there were many things common to all of them, and many others common to two or more of them.

With the advent of a new administration another thorough revision was made in the winter of 1910. In this, differentiation was made with the freshman year when courses of different groups are considered, but the agricultural courses were, as before, alike for the first two years, and the engineering courses were nearly alike for the first two years. The poultry husbandry course was abandoned as such, but opportunities for electing freely were provided in all of the agricultural courses. The engineering courses were fixed throughout—no electives. The course in home economics provided a limited opportunity for election, and the junior and senior years in the course in general science were made nearly entirely elective. To provide for profitable election, a considerable number of groups of electives were carefully worked out. To guard against aimless frittering away of energy upon unrelated subjects, it was provided that electives must be by groups approved by the Faculty or the deans. The limited elections previously allowed had been governed by the same principle. The opportunity to elect is designed to enable the student, who by the work of the previous years has become grounded in fundamental things, to elect a group of subjects that will give him special training in some direction in which he is interested.

This reformulation of courses was based on an increase in entrance requirements, and thus some opportunity was given for increasing the technical work. This in the agricultural courses was thoroughly overhauled and brought down to date under the masterly guidance of President Waters.

The great field of journalism occupied by periodicals devoted to the interests of agriculture and other industries, and the lack of courses of study designed to train for work in this field, led to the establishment of the course in industrial journalism in 1911. This included English language and literature, sciences, history, economics, and other subjects, and special attention to elected subjects in agriculture, mechanic arts, home economics, or applied science.

With the adoption in 1912 of a four-year high school course as a requirement for admission to all of the College courses, a revision of the latter became necessary in 1913. This was carefully carried out by committees of the Divisional Faculties, then passed upon by these Faculties, then by the General Faculty, and finally by the Board of Regents. The new Board of Administration, which with reference to courses of study came into control in March, 1913, gave its approval to the new courses excepting the printing course, which, with the approval and formal recommendation of the Faculty, it abolished. This abolition of the four-year course did not carry with it abandonment of instruction in printing. Work in this field may still be taken by any who so desire.

The probabilities are that the courses as now laid down will remain with but little change for a good many years. Four years of high school work being now required for admission, changes in entrance requirements will probably not affect them. The subjects required to be included in the high school course offered for admission are: Three years of English, two or three years of mathematics, one year of physics, and one year of history or social science. The remainder of fifteen units may be additional work in these subjects or anything taught in a satisfactory manner in an accredited high school. It is recognized that high schools should be organized to serve the needs of their respective communities, and it is believed that the colleges should take the output of the high schools without much dictation as to what they shall teach.

Built upon so liberal a high school foundation, the College courses offered must in themselves provide for even the elementary training in some things, if they are essential to subsequent work. Among these are: Sciences, modern languages, agriculture, cooking, sewing, shopwork, and drawing. If students come who have had training substantially covering such elementary work, they are given other courses instead of these, or, if they have surplus high school subjects, are allowed to take examinations for advanced credit.

While it is in some ways a convenience to have four years of work grouped about a principal idea, as was exemplified in the courses in agronomy, animal husbandry, dairy husbandry, and horticulture and forestry, the growth of other departments, and other practical considerations, led to the adoption of a change of plan, and now the College offers one course in agriculture in which 162 of 214 term hours, or credits, are definitely fixed, and in connection with which 35 to 40 additional hours of agriculture must be elected and 17 to 12 hours of additional non-agriculture. This gives great flexibility to the situation. In the agricultural line, groups of electives are offered in agronomy, animal husbandry, dairy husbandry, horticulture, forestry, poultry husbandry, and milling industry.

The course in veterinary medicine has been carefully revised and strengthened in several points, and graduates from it are fully recognized by the highest authorities in this country. Men over 21 years of age are admitted to its advantages as special students if unable to meet the full entrance requirements.

The engineering courses were not changed much in this revision, and are still separately stated as specialized courses in mechanical engineering, electrical engineering, civil engineering, and architecture.

The course in home economics was not changed very much, but several minor adjustments were made. It includes no mathematics, and its strongest scientific work is in chemistry. Household physics, human physiology, zoology including embryology, microbiology, and household entomology constitute the remainder of the work in sciences. Extensive instruction is given in domestic art and domestic science, and 24 hours of elective work give opportunity for additional study in home economics, sciences, professional educational branches, or other subjects.

The course in industrial journalism was changed but little and remains as a special formulation of work suitable to accompany two years of journalism proper, though much of the course is elective.

The course in general science gives training in fundamental lines in English, mathematics, chemistry, physics, botany, and zoology, with certain cultural subjects, and allows election of the remainder of the course from a considerable number of elective groups. It is especially adapted to the needs of those who are planning to teach sciences or technical subjects in the high schools, and those who are fitting themselves for experiment station work in the sciences. Electives may be chosen in bacteriology, botany, chemistry, English, English literature, German, history, economics, pedagogy, agriculture, home economics, manual training, industrial journalism, and other subjects.

This imperfect sketch of the development of the scope of the instructional work at the College shows that throughout the half century of its existence there has been a steady development in the scope and quality of the courses offered. It is believed that the present courses offer opportunities for patrons of the College to arrange for almost any kind of work, or combination of subjects, properly coming within the scope of this institution. The chief development of the future will be in the graduate instruction. This can not be strongly emphasized until the teaching force is sufficient in numbers so that men and women are not over-burdened with the duties of undergraduate teaching. Graduate work can not be profitably directed unless those in charge of it have some time to devote to it. The hours of teaching now required of the members of the Faculty are far beyond those in most institutions, and really tax the energies of teachers to the limit. Not only the opportunity for graduate work, but the highest quality of performance in undergraduate teaching, demands that the number of classes handled by each individual be small enough so that the teacher can give adequate preparation for each class, and conduct it with energy and enthusiasm.

CHANGES IN COLLEGE LIFE

The students of to-day can scarcely realize the change in social conditions in Manhattan and the College that a third of a century has brought about. While there were scattered houses in various places over the town site, the village in 1879 may be said to have practically extended no further west than Eighth street and from Laramie street to the Union Pacific railway. The College buildings were limited to the stone barn, which was demolished in the fall of 1913; the building now used for farm machinery, then called the old barn; the old horticulture building; the central part of the east wing of the shops; the chemistry building now used as the chemistry annex; and the north wing of Anderson Hall. President Fairchild lived on the campus in the house later occupied by the custodian of buildings. With the exception of the old cottonwoods and the hackberry on the slope southeast of Anderson Hall, there were no trees of any size on the campus, though many had been planted. The cedar trees between Denison Hall and Anderson Hall were there, also the wreck of an old residence. Lovers' Lane was bordered by the same maple trees that are still there, and got its name at that time. There was actually a lane there then, three or four rods wide, fenced on both sides, and running across the farm east and west. It was a public road. This was closed in 1880, and the fences removed. The old stone walk there, now mostly covered by earth which has washed in, was the only one giving access to the College grounds. The roads and walks now used were then in corn fields and pastures, hence every one walked through Lovers' Lane. This much for the general setting of the scene.

The only student organizations then were the Webster and Alpha Beta Literary Societies, which met Saturday evening and Friday afternoon, respectively, and a prayer meeting maintained by Professor Platt, which met Friday evening. There was no theater, opera house, or picture show in Manhattan. The largest assembly room in the town was the Presbyterian Church, and hence Commencement exercises of the College and other largely-attended meetings were held there. There was no such thing as organized College athletics of any kind, the nearest approach being occasional matched games of baseball between the patrons of different boarding houses. College classes all met before luncheon, there being five recitation periods of fifty minutes each. There was afternoon work on the farm, and in the orchards and shops, and before long some of this was regularly scheduled for students.

It will be seen that there was not much to encroach upon the student's time in the way of temptations to social dissipation, and that there was a good deal of time in the afternoon as well as the evening for study. Saturday was a complete holiday, no classes of any kind being held on that day. With the winter term, 1896, the holiday was changed from Saturday to Monday. Thus a student had one free day for special College tasks, for working to earn money toward paying his way, or for picnic trips to Dripping Springs, Rocky Ford, or any of the places that are well known at the present time. A good many of the old-timers believe that, in consequence of this lack of opportunity for doing anything else, the students of those days devoted much more time to study, and actually obtained a firmer grasp of the work assigned them. It is difficult to decide a question of this kind. The financial resources of the people of the State were very meager compared with those of the present, and very few students were sent to College. Nearly all of them went because of an intense desire for knowledge, and thus possibly a larger percentage were of superior intellectual capacity. At the present time, when it is the fashion for every one to go to college, and the wealth of the people permits so many more to keep up with the fashion in this respect, there are naturally many more students who have limited ability to carry college work, and this tends to reduce the average accomplishment.

Occasionally a noted man was secured to deliver a lecture. Lecture was stigmatized as "dry" by those who attend lectures in The Science Club at one time obtained Alfred Russel Wallace. His order to be amused. In the early days, as now, a speaker to be popular had to be funny at least part of the time, and fluency of speech much more than offset depth of thought. It was a great advance when the people of the town, with the support of those of the College, inaugurated a series of lectures which were given in the opera house along in the eighties. Joseph Cook, then at the height of his fame as a lecturer, was one of the attractions.

Colonel Bain, who was here within a year or two, also lectured here about thirty years ago.

Where Youth is, Pleasure comes, whether in simple garb and circumstance, or clad in the robes of luxury and set out in pomp and pageantry. Youth and Pleasure met in the social life of the College in early days as truly as now, and, as Youth was there, Pleasure was as keen and robust in those limited circumstances as she is under the comparatively luxurious conditions of the present.

The opportunities to spend money in those days were very limited. There were no regular places of entertainment. The skating rink was perhaps the first enterprise of this kind. Moore built his opera house about the same time, and this has developed into the Wareham theater. In addition to that, we now have the Marshall theatre and three picture shows all running at once, perhaps. Then, as now, dances under the auspices of the College were unknown. Students occasionally met for dancing, but such events were rare. Now they are too common for mention in the news columns of the local papers, unless characterized by unusual features.

College fraternities and sororities were unheard of. The nearest approach to the advantages of such organizations was the family boarding-place, in which the lady of the house felt some responsibility for the conduct of her patrons. The best of these charged three-fifty a week for board and room, furnish your own fuel and fire the stove yourself. Many life-long friendships were established in those homes, and many jolly times and not a few College pranks had their inception there.

The churches thirty-five years ago had not begun to give to students as such the attention that they do now, when each has a social gathering for them at the beginning of the College year, and caters to their needs throughout. The College Faculty, realizing that Youth and Pleasure ought to meet now and then, made some special effort to bring this about. College socials were held each term, to which the Faculty and the students were invited. These usually included a program of some sort—musical, literary, dramatic, or athletic—followed by old-fashioned games, conversation, etc. No refreshments; these are the device of a more luxurious age.

As numbers increased and the College social became unwieldy, classes and societies began holding their own; professors entertained certain classes; and February 21, 1896, the last general social was held, and a useful function that had served its purpose went out in a blaze of glory.

In the earlier years recreation was found by students in excursions afield, rather than by evening parties, to a greater extent than is the case now. The collections of plants and insects that the teachers of those days required favored this. Furthermore, the students had more opportunity for concerted expeditions of that kind then than now, when College classes are held six days of the week without distinction, and eight hours per day. As the days and the daytime have been appropriated for College work, evening student affairs have gained more and more in vogue. With this is of course a larger temptation to expenditure, and a substitution of art for nature, and sweets and ices for sandwiches and fried chicken.

The development of College athletics has done much to keep students together, and serves a valuable social purpose. It is the chief agency through which solidarity of College spirit is created and maintained. In the early days no one would have dreamed that the time would come when classes would be dismissed for a football game. But if classes are ordinarily in session forty-eight hours per week, some innovations are necessary if the natural instinct to play and to watch play is to be met with favor at all.

Space limitations forbid further comparisons of the old and the present College life. Is the new better? Are the old means of getting acquainted worn out? Judging by what may be seen on the Wild Cat or Prospect or in Hackberry Glen or any of many attractive places, we conclude that the students of the present use all of the means of enjoyment known to their predecessors, and then some. However this may be, wherever Youth is, Pleasure always comes, whether rowing on the river, tramping the fields, picnicing in the woods, packing the Auditorium for the annual oratorical contest, or banqueting the Junior-Senior four hundred.

SOME OF THE FIRST THINGS

The first building used by the Kansas State Agricultural College was originally erected as Bluemont Central College, which was the first college chartered in the territory, the date being February 9, 1858. It was located on the old College farm near the old site of the hog cholera serum plant. The corner-stone was laid May 10, 1859. The building was three stories high and 44x60 feet on the ground. It had a cupola in which hung the bell which still calls the College to assembly. This bell was donated by Joseph Ingalls, of Swampscott, Mass.

The first building erected by the College on the present campus was one wing of a stone barn. This is the building which was so long used in part as the armory, and is now used for farm mechanics. The oldest building on the campus was there when the land was bought by the College, being one of the three farm-houses included in that purchase. It was used by President Fairchild as a residence, then by Professor Shelton, and is now occupied by Custodian Lewis.

The ivy on the College buildings is one of the striking features of the campus, and its origin is of some interest. In the second biennial report of the College, 1879-'80, Prof. H. E. Van Deman states: "Accompanied by some of my class, I went to the woods and procured some four hundred plants of the American Ivy (Ampelopsis virginiana), and placed them at the base of all of the College buildings except the barn." This may not have been the very first, but evidently it was the most extensive planting. Professor Van Deman was here less than a year, September 3, 1878, to May 21, 1879. He filled a prominent place in horticultural work in the country.

The first term in the Kansas State Agricultural College began September 2, 1863, and closed December 1, 1863. Twenty-six young men and an equal number of young women were enrolled.

The first Faculty of the College was organized in July, 1863, and included: Rev. Joseph Denison, president, mental and moral science and ancient languages; J. E. Schnebly, mathematics and natural science; Miss Belle M. Haines, teacher in Preparatory Department; Miss C. E. Beckwith, teacher of melodeon and piano.

December 3, 1863, Rev. N. O. Preston was elected professor of mathematics and English literature, and J. Evarts Platt was elected principal of the Preparatory Department and professor of vocal music. These gentlemen did not begin their service before the next spring, and perhaps not until the next fall term.

Industrial work has been a prominent feature of student instruction here for over forty years. The annual report for 1871 records the existence of a "labor class" in agriculture in which students were enrolled, and upon which regular attendance was required. The students were paid for this labor at an average rate of 15.5 cents per hour. Enrollment was voluntary, but "after such enrollment, prompt attendance, as in other class and College exercises," was required. Student labor had been employed previously, but this is the first record of its organization as a class. This was under Supt. Fred E. Miller.

In the judgment of President Anderson, "The first systematic teaching of practical agriculture in this institution" was given by Elbridge Gale, professor of horticulture, who, while acting superintendent of the farm, February and March, 1874, organized a class of nine young men "in practical agriculture, and a course of elementary lectures was commenced, embracing discussion of such subjects as seemed of the most obvious importance."

The first pure-bred animals were purchased in 1873, being selected by Regent J. K. Hudson and Major Fred E. Miller, superintendent of the farm. Cattle, swine, and poultry were included.

Alfalfa was first sown by the College the first week in April, 1875. One and one-half or two acres were put in, using California seed. The results were so satisfactory to Professor Shelton that he put in six acres the next spring.

The first orchard trees were set in 1867. These included 200 apple trees, and smaller numbers of cherries, crabs, plums, etc.

The first forest trees to receive mention were planted in 1867. There were 500 of them.

Mechanic arts as exemplified by carpentry and blacksmithing was first taught in 1872, by Captain Ambrose Todd, master mechanic, in a wooden building 20x40 feet, erected by the students under his direction.

The first instruction in sewing was given in December, 1873, by Mrs. H. C. Cheseldine. There were twelve students "in sewing, dressmaking, and millinery." It was all hand work. Four machines were purchased in 1874, and instruction in this art has been given every term since. This is believed to be the beginning in the United States of continuous instruction in household arts.

The first instruction in domestic science was given by Wm. K. Kedzie, professor of chemistry. This consisted in a course of lectures in household chemistry, delivered to a class of twenty advanced lady students during the fall term of 1875. As there was no kitchen laboratory at that time, "many of the young ladies of the class, at their own homes, performed the experiments described in the lectures, in cooking, manufacture of bread by new processes, etc., bringing the result into class for examination the following day."

The first kitchen laboratory was established in the south wing of the chemical laboratory erected in 1876. This building is now called the Chemistry Annex, and that room is used for the State work in analysis of foods, feeding-stuffs, and fertilizers. For ten years the building was used as the Women's Gymnasium.

Military work at the College began the first term, 1863, with an organization of ten or twelve young men, who were drilled by one of their number, Captain John M. Howard. The Civil War was in progress then, the country had had an object lesson in unpreparedness, and it was not difficult to arouse martial spirit.

The first farmers' institute held under the auspices of the College, and what is believed to be the first one ever held anywhere under that name, was held in Manhattan, November 14, 1868. The program was as follows:

Relation of the Kansas State Agricultural College to the Agricultural Interests of Kansas.....	Pres. J. Denison
Tree Borers.....	Prof. B. F. Mudge
Culture of Forest Trees.....	Rev. E. Gale
Economy on the Farm.....	Prof. J. S. Hougham

The subjects were discussed by the institute. Geo. T. Anthony, editor of the "Kansas Farmer," was present and "made one of those finished and magnetic speeches which so few men know how to make," and later gave an eight-column report of the meeting in the "Farmer" for December, 1868.

The first graduate to become a college professor was George H. Failyer, class of 1877, who was made professor of chemistry and physics, Kansas State Agricultural College, in 1878.

The first student to become a college president was William A. Quayle, student 1879-'80, who became president of Baker University in 1890.

The first graduate to become a college president was Ernest F. Nichols, class of 1888, who, after a distinguished career as a professor and an investigator, was made president of Dartmouth College June 8, 1909. However, Edward O. Sisson, class of 1886, became director of Bradley Polytechnic Institute in 1897.

The first graduate to become a regent of the College was William H. Phipps, class of 1895, who was appointed in 1898.

The first graduate elected to represent his State in the National Congress was Rollin R. Rees, class of 1885, who served from 1911 to 1913, being elected from the Fifth district of Kansas.

The first child of a graduate to be graduated from the College was May Haines Bowen (now Mrs. Schoonover), class of 1896. Her mother, Emma (Haines) Bowen, is a member of the first class, 1867.

The first son of a graduate to be graduated was Raymond Haines Pond, class of 1898, son of Belle (Haines) Pond, also a member of the first graduating class, and one of the teachers the first year of the College.

The first death among the alumni was that of George L. Platt, class of 1878, a brilliant young man who died the same year that he was graduated.

The first death in the Faculty was that of Prof. N. O. Preston, professor of mathematics and English literature, who died very suddenly, February 14, 1866. "He was present at the laying of the corner stone, and had been a steadfast friend of the institution from the first."

ATTENDANCE

The attendance at the College has always been a question of interest, and is in a certain sense an index of the success with which it has appealed to the people of the State as an educational institution. As time passes, students often acquire a wrong impression of the numbers actually in attendance while they were in College, and for the convenience of all, there is included herewith the statistics on this subject as far as they could be ascertained. The record as given for the period from 1863 to 1878 has been collected with considerable difficulty, and is published for the first time. The later years have been published in the College catalogue and are taken from it, but the figures have been checked and corrected by the original publications.

The early statistics concerning attendance were not published on a uniform plan, and in some cases it is difficult to know just what is meant. In a number of cases there is no total given for either the College year or the calendar year. The publications of totals for the calendar year is a misleading method of presenting statistics. If a student, for example, attends the College but one College year he should in all fairness be counted in only one year, but by taking totals for a calendar year, this one's name would appear in the fall of one year and the winter and spring of another, and so be counted twice. The data, therefore, for calendar years give a misleading idea in respect to the actual total enrollment. The enrollment by terms is a better measure.

In the above cut showing the position of College buildings on the campus, the buildings are designated by letters as follows: A—Anderson Hall (main building); Ag—Agricultural Hall (new), only the east wing completed; C—Denison Hall (Physical Science Hall); D—Dairy Hall; E—Engineering Hall; F—Fairchild Hall (library); G—Agricultural Hall (old); H—Horticultural Hall; K—Kedzie Hall (printing); L—Domestic Science and Art Hall; M—Auditorium; N—Nichols Gymnasium; P—Stock-judging Pavilion; R—Farm Mechanics Hall (old Armory); S—Shops; V—Veterinary Hall; W—Chemistry Annex (old chemistry building and later Women's Gymnasium).

That alumni who have not visited the College in recent years may have a better idea of the increase in buildings that has taken place during the last one-third of its history, the accompanying map is given. This does not show four wooden barns and several other structures in the northeast corner of the campus. On the land across the road north of the campus is the large new stone barn, erected in 1913, the veterinary hospital building, extensive sheds furnishing quarters for several hundred animals, the poultry plant, and a farmhouse. On the half section of land purchased in 1909, situated about two miles northwest of the campus, there is another farmhouse, and several other buildings.
